Her coaching style is one of challenge and compassion bringing a down to earth, curious and empathic way of working with individuals and teams to help them get to grips with their challenges. In her team coaching she draws on a range of organisational development and leadership frameworks as well as bringing a psychodynamic, emotions based and behaviour lens to help teams notice their interactions, become more aware of their choices and their wider systemic impact.

She has been at the helm of delivering senior leadership development programmes to NATO for the last 10 years and recently, some significant coaching led leadership and culture change programmes to health and housing sector clients. She provided significant resilience and well-being support for NHS individuals and teams throughout the COVID crisis, and she is also a faculty supervisor on an Association for Coaching accredited Coaching Mastery programme for new coaches.

Raised and educated in Belfast she is a graduate of Queens University. She joined the British Army as an education & training officer in the late 80s, serving for 18 years in a variety of global locations, training soldiers and officers as well as leading teams in multi-national appointments and high-profile staff roles in the Ministry of Defence.

She now lives in Cambridgeshire with her husband and has a grown-up daughter working in London. In her private life she brings her desire to help develop young people and has been heavily involved in Girlguiding and as a Duke of Edinburgh's Award expedition supervisor.
